

SOMETHING NEW: VIDEO STORIES
April 5, 2013

By Michael Erlewine (Michael@Erlewine.net)

Welcome friends to "Short Stories," short video vignettes that I put together as I have time. These easy little pieces won't be tutorial or didactic, but just short and fun, a way of sharing with you what is going on here in northern Michigan as the seasons flow. I hope you enjoy them.

This first "Short Story" shows how spring, although always a little late, eventually comes and the earth moves, the flood plains fill with huge blocks of ice, and gradually turn to water. The streams are full and on a good day the sun is bright. Margaret and I and two dogs are out in the woods following the streams to their icy source.

And the first butterflies are out, the "Mourning Cloak," which is one of only a few common butterflies that hibernate, so they are always first out.

Enjoy
